Beginning of the Country Club

When the Lake Ripley Country Club was formed in 1915, it was not a very big organization. Several people from the lake and Cambridge area started it and there were 21 members belonging to the club the first year.

The original golf course at the club was a five-hole course. There was no club house at all until a small, roughly built cottage was constructed on the property five years later. It served as a changing place for the golfers.

As the years went by, the club members gradually increased the size of their club. They bought more of the pasture land around the club and made it into a nine hole golf course. And later, another adjoining strip of land was bought, and the course became the present 18 hole course.

The most recent purchase was of an additional 35 acres of land to be used to enlarge the course, but nothing has been done with it at this time.

A private corporation owns the country club, and in order to be a member, a person must own a share of the stock. The club is run by a board of directors who are elected from among the club members. The board hires the club manager and fairway manager.

The first president of the board was Dr. G.E. Bilstad, and the first vice-president was E.L. Dawes. Alvin R. Amundson was the first secretary of the board and remained so for 30 years. Art Melster served as president for 26 years, giving up the job two years ago to Don Rumpf, who is the present president.

The first manager of the club was Ed Leitzinger, and he lived in a little house right there on the club property. The current club manager is George Culver, and Pro Bergholz has been the fairway manager for a number of years.

The board of directors appointed a building committee to come up with a plan for a suitable club house many years back, and Art Melster was the youngest member of the committee. He was the one who drew up the plan for the original clubhouse which was built sometime around 1926. Since that time, the club house has been enlarged four times.

The watering system for the fairways was installed four years ago.

Over the 61 years since the club was formed, the membership has increased to a little under 400 members. The present board of directors consists of Don Rumpf, Art Melster, Clyde Heberlein, Clayton Wallace, Frank Thatcher and Alex Zirath and Reuben Corrigan of Fort Atkinson.
